

DIED FOR HIS FAMILY.

J. J. Schwarz Killed Himself that They Might Get His Insurance.

Found Drowned To-Day in the Old Central Park Reservoir.

Had Sought Everywhere for Employment, but in Vain.

Foreman Gilmore, in charge of a gang of Park laborers, while leaning against the south wall of the old reservoir in Central Park this morning, saw what seemed to be the body of a man in the water.

Such it proved to be, and later in the day, when the body was identified as that of Jean Joseph Schwarz, of 591½ East Eightieth street, the story of one of the most deliberate and premeditated suicides on record became known.

Schwarz was a man of splendid physique, and he was also a man of intelligence. It was no sudden despair or sickness that caused him to take his life.

It was simply because he could not afford to see his wife and their year-old child go hungry when there was enough insurance on his life to provide for them for some time at least after his death.

In order that they might have the benefit of the insurance money he killed himself. The wife had lost a husband, the child a father, but they will be richer by about $1,500.

Schwarz was a German who had been here in this country many years. He was a cornice-maker by trade, and was in good standing in his union. He was also a member of the Socialistic Labor party.

About Jan. 1 last he was thrown out of work, and although he searched the city for another job after he was dismissed he could get nothing to do.

He was willing to do anything, and when he heard that the State Legislature had passed an act entitled "An act to provide work for the poor he applied for a position as laborer in the parks.

Again in that, however, he failed, and bitterly he told his wife that he would require political influence to obtain it.

Failure to obtain work made him desperate, but he managed to pay the premiums on his insurance. He had a dollar had about been spent when Tuesday last he attended a meeting of his union.

On leaving that place he deliberately made up his mind to kill himself. Going to a friendly store he procured pen, ink and paper, and wrote a last farewell to his wife.

It was written in German and couched in most tender language. It said among other things that by the time she received the letter she would not be among the living.

It told about his insurance and what she must do to collect it. Then the letter gave directions as to his funeral and the undertaker to be employed.

It concluded by telling her to show the letter to her friends.

Havering directed and sealed the letter, he took a train up town and walked to his wife's home. There he must have faltered.

He feared to go upstairs, as if in sight of his wife and the child to whom his heart attached would shake his resolution.

Instead of going upstairs to the neat little flat on the third floor, he dropped on the floor below, and hastened away. The letter was found by his wife next morning.

He may have gone at once to a place where the body was found in on a direct line with Seventy-ninth street.

In order to carry out his intention he had to cross the river, and nearly four feet high, and then walk forward about ten feet.

The water had been down to the waist, and is full of jagged rocks. When he jumped his clothing must have caught some way in the rocks, for the body was found there, just a little under the water. When found it was buried considerably.

Policeman Nevin, who had been called to remove the dead body, found the man, a negro, lying on the floor of the Morgue. Schwarz was trying bitterly when he was found.

He also summoned the dead man, and the body was taken to the Morgue.
